Chapter 26:
TELESCOPING THE TIMES  Cold War Conflicts
CHAPTER OVERVIEW After World War II, tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union lead to a war without direct military confrontation—a Cold War.

Section 1: Origins of the Cold War
MAIN IDEA The United States and the Soviet Union emerged from World War II as two "superpowers" with vastly different political and economic systems.

The Cold War was the state of hostility without direct military confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union. The formation of the United Nations (UN) in 1945, which was intended to keep peace, did not succeed in stopping the conflicts between these two superpowers.

One reason for the start of the Cold War was the conflicting political and economic systems of the United States and Soviet Union. In the U.S. system of democracy and capitalism, citizens elect their political leaders and are free to buy and sell products in an open market. However, in the Soviet Communist system, the leaders of the Communist party chose the nation’s leaders, and government officials decided what products were available to buy.

Another reason for the outbreak of the Cold War was the disagreement over the future of Europe after World War II. The Truman administration wanted strong, stable democracies in Europe to prevent totalitarianism and to provide a market to sell U.S. products. Soviet leader Joseph Stalin, on the other hand, wanted control of Eastern Europe to protect against another invasion from the west and to rebuild the Soviet Union’s own war-damaged economy.
To achieve his goals, Stalin set up Communist governments in Eastern Europe. Because these new Communist countries were dominated by the Soviet Union, they were called satellite nations. In 1946 Winston Churchill announced that Europe had been divided by an “iron curtain” into East and West, communism and capitalism.

To stop further Soviet influence in Europe, the Truman administration adopted a policy of containment. Under the Truman Doctrine, the United States could send military and economic aid to any country trying to prevent a Communist takeover. To rebuild Europe after the war and encourage capitalism, the Marshall Plan provided billions of dollars to those nations that cooperated with U.S. economic goals. Germany was split in two—West Germany and the Soviet-dominated East Germany.

The United States also formed a defensive military alliance with its European allies called the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). The members of NATO pledged that an attack on one country was an attack on all.

Section 2: The Cold War Heats Up
MAIN IDEA After World War II, China became a Communist nation and Korea was split into a Communist North and a democratic South.

After defeating the Japanese in World War II, the U.S. supported the Chinese Nationalist Army lead by Chiang Kai-shek fought Mao Zedong’s Communist forces. Mao won this civil war in 1948 and made China a Communist country. Chiang and his followers fled to Taiwan, an island off China’s southeast coast.

At the end of World War II, Korea was divided along the 38th parallel into two separate countries: the Communist North and the capitalist South. When the North Korean army invaded South Korea in 1950 to unify the country, the United States called on the members of the United Nations to help.
Under the command of U.S. General Douglas MacArthur, troops from 21 UN countries—about 90 percent of them American—fought with the South Korean army. MacArthur was able to push the North Koreans toward the Chinese border, but then, Communist Chinese troops attacked, driving MacArthur and his troops back into South Korea. Although the fighting remained fierce, neither side gained much ground.

MacArthur wanted to use nuclear weapons to invade China, but Truman opposed this expansion of the war. When MacArthur continued to argue for his plan in the press, Truman fired him as commander. Finally, after three years, the war ended in a stalemate with North and South Korea honoring the 38th parallel as the border dividing them.

Section 3: The Cold War at Home

MAIN IDEA During the late 1940s and early 1950s, fear of Communism led to reckless charges against innocent citizens.

Many Americans felt threatened by the rise of Communist governments in Europe and Asia. Some even felt that Communists could threaten the U.S. government from within.

Pressured by his Republican critics to do something, President Truman set up a Loyalty Review Board to investigate government employees. This board questioned more than 3 million people and removed about 200 from their jobs.

In 1947, a Congressional committee called the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) began an investigation of Communist influence in the movie industry. Although most people brought before the committee cooperated, ten men refused. These men, known as the Hollywood Ten, felt that the committee’s questions were unconstitutional, and they went to prison for refusing to answer. Their careers were ruined.
In 1950, over Truman’s veto, Congress passed the McCarran Act that outlawed the planning of any action that might lead to the subversion, or overthrow, of the U.S. government.

Two spy cases in the late 1940s increased fears of communism. The first involved a State Department official named Alger Hiss, who was accused of spying for the Soviet Union. In the second case, Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, members of the American Communist Party, were convicted of helping to give the Soviets information about the atomic bomb. The Rosenbergs were executed for their crime.

In the early 1950s, Republican Senator Joseph McCarthy claimed that hundreds of Communists had infiltrated the State Department. McCarthy never actually produced any evidence to prove his accusations, but his Republican colleagues in the Senate encouraged his bullying tactics, known as McCarthyism.

McCarthy’s unsupported charges violated the constitutional rights of the people he accused and often ruined their careers. Then in 1954, during televised hearings into the U.S. Army, McCarthy’s vicious behavior was revealed to American viewers. As a result, he lost public support, and the Senate voted to condemn him for improper conduct.

Section 4: Two Nations Live on the Edge
MAIN IDEA During the late 1950s, the United States and the Soviet Union came to the brink of nuclear war.

By 1953, the United States and the Soviet Union had developed both the atomic bomb and the hydrogen bomb, or H-bomb. The administration of President Dwight D. Eisenhower announced that, if necessary, it was prepared to use all of its nuclear weapons against the Soviet Union. The Soviets responded by building more nuclear bombs, thus starting an arms race with the United States. This willingness of the U.S. to go to an all-out war was known as brinkmanship.
Other developments also increased hostilities. In the early 1950s, the United States used the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to interfere with some foreign governments through covert operations, or secret activities. Meanwhile, in response to the growth of NATO, the Soviets formed a military alliance with their Eastern European satellites called the Warsaw Pact.

In 1956, the new head of the Soviet Communist Party, Nikita Khrushchev, crushed a growing reform movement in Hungary by sending in Soviet tanks. That same year, the Soviets threatened to launch a missile attack against British, French, and Israeli troops who had seized control of the Suez Canal, an international waterway located in Egypt.

The United States and the Soviet Union fought the Cold War in the skies. The Soviets shocked the world in 1957 by launching Sputnik I, the first unmanned artificial satellite. In 1960 the Soviets shot down a CIA spy plane, the U-2, over its territory and captured the pilot. Although the pilot was eventually returned to the United States, the U-2 incident further damaged U.S.-Soviet relations.
